So, we went to Denver a few weeks ago and spent some time sightseeing there and you can't even get a beer in Denver. And we were looking at the Guinness Book of World Records and this is what people have done in home beer making. And the guy really was an A1 freak about it. So we looked, we saw a case of Guinness. You could buy it in that store. And they said that the record is three months and it would cost about $10,000 to get through the process and, of course, the money. The machine. I got it all put together. The machine that would do it and the fermenter all with a hood so you wouldn't get any beer on the outside of the machine. And I said, you know, "you've got the sanitary thing. We don't need a hood. We'll put on a rubber apron. Why don't we just get a big Rubbermaid container." He said, "Well, we put on the rubber apron. We put a rubber finger in it and suck the beer out. It doesn't work." I said, "Well, we'll see 648931e174

It was just a game then, and I used to play it with my sister and brothers before we left home. My dad had a different way of playing it than my mom did. The sounds that were on his record did sound, similar to the percussion style that bongo drums are played with. Most of my musical experience in my early years was from a classical violin teacher at my school. I remember playing stuff like "Fantasy on Greensleeves" and "Carnival of the Animals", the violin version. I also remember playing a piece of Chuck Berry's, a song he wrote called "Johnny B. Goode". I remember exactly what the words were, it was kind of a school song. I don't remember the exact words to the song, but, I remember all the lyrics to it. When I was about 4 years old, I began playing the piano. I remember my dad teaching me how to play "Happy Birthday", and we made up some words to it. Another instrument that I played from a young age was the clarinet. My dad had a record of "Frere Javel" that he played. It was a copy of a record I think was a left over copy of "Frere Javel" that my dad picked up. It was a progressive jazz style. He used to play that record for my brother and I before we went to bed. When I was in grade school, I began playing "No Strings Attached" which was by Earth, Wind and Fire, and it had the song "Shake Your Booty" on it. It was a
